One year on from Cyclone Idai’s landfall on 14 March 2019, more than 1.8 million people across central Mozambique have received life-saving assistance. Despite remarkable achievements, living conditions in affected areas remain precarious. Heavy rains and flooding since December 2019 have worsened the situation, affecting 72,800 people, damaging over 4,000 shelters in resettlements sites set-up for people displaced by Cyclone Idai, and causing loss of crops amidst an already fragile food security situation. Continued humanitarian assistance is critical to save lives and alleviate suffering while livelihoods are restored and communities recover. Yet, the Humanitarian Response Plan for Mozambique is less than 50 per cent funded. Many partners are having to scale back activities and more funding is urgently required.

*The figures here include only the response of humanitarian partners, and not the Government of Mozambique’s response. The budget is the total financial requirement for cyclones Idai and Kenneth, drought and insecurity responses through until May 2020.  At the peak of the response, three coordination hubs and two forward operations bases were established. Two of them remain operative one year on.
